Malacopedia is an exclusively digital journal devoted to divulgation of scientific information and curiosities on any member or taxon of the Phylum Mollusca. It is open access and has no commercial purpose.

Malacopedia is relatively informal and has not the strict rules of a scientific journal, despite in maintaining strict scientific rigor in all information. The papers are richly illustrated, the text is limited to the essential, and there is the possibility to be corrected or complemented further, as well as the paper can posteriorly include information giving by interested reader in the form of correspondence.

Malacopedia arisen from the necessity of spreading information which difficulty can be published in formal journals. The information is mainly derived from experience in studying the animals, part of wider research projects, and it is not necessary focus of a specific project on it; this gives the informal scenario of the journal.

Malacopedia name, as it can be easily realized, came from the junction of the words Malacology and Encyclopedia, which has been used in internet (e.g., Wikipedia). Despite in having as objective the divulgation of my personal experience, other colleagues are welcome to publish their information, using a paper as model, and sending the MS to the above emails.

Malacopedia welcomes everybody for the wonders of the Malacology, as mollusks are fascinating animals. The websites that the journal can be accessed are:
